Humor

always help create a positive first impression.

Studies show overly conceited people are deeply insecure. The arrogance serves as a smoke screen to over compensate for the inadequate feelings inside.

To play 'confident' when you're actually not, act assertively in your thoughts and body languages, but boldly throw in occasional LIGHT self-deprecating jokes like "My imaginary friends would have laughed at that joke. ." To balance the scale between conceit and modesty.

You'll seem a lot more approachable, but not stampedable
(As in people wouldn't dare to treat you like a doormat, even if you feel like a doormat sometimes. Don't let them know.)

What you call yourself behind closed doors, stays behind closed doors.

On the street,
Awesome
is your name.
